Great Dying never exist

The "What if Great Dying Permian Extinction never happened" timeline explores a world where one of Earth's most devastating mass extinctions never occurred. In this alternate history, the Permian period would have continued undisturbed, allowing for the flourishing of diverse and unique species of Animals

1

The Great Dying Extinction

The Permian-Triassic extinction event, also known as the Great Dying, was the most severe mass extinction in Earth's history. It wiped out an estimated 96% of all marine species and 70% of terrestrial vertebrate species. The cause of this extinction event is believed to be a combination of volcanic activity, climate change, and anoxia (oxygen depletion) in the oceans. This event dramatically reshaped the Earth's ecosystems and allowed new species to evolve and fill the ecological niches left vacant by the extinction.

A Diverse Ecosystem

Without the Great Dying, the Earth's ecosystems would have remained highly diverse and populated by a wide range of species. Marine life would have continued to flourish and evolve, with a more balanced distribution of species and habitats. Terrestrial ecosystems would have also thrived, with a greater abundance of land-dwelling animals and plants. This stable and diverse ecosystem would have provided ample opportunities for the evolution of new species and the development of complex food webs.

3

The Rise of the Dinosaurs

One significant consequence of the absence of the Great Dying would have been the uninterrupted rise of the dinosaurs. The extinction event caused a major shift in Earth's ecosystems, eliminating many of the dominant vertebrate groups at the time. However, some reptile groups managed to survive and evolve, eventually giving rise to the dinosaurs. Without the Great Dying, these ancestral reptiles would have faced less competition and potentially evolved at a slower pace, resulting in a different evolutionary trajectory for the group.

4

Mammals Take the Stage

The prolonged diversity and stability of the Earth's ecosystems following the absence of the Great Dying would have allowed mammals to take center stage much earlier in Earth's history. With less competition from reptiles and other vertebrate groups, mammals could have diversified and evolved into various niches, potentially filling ecological roles typically occupied by dinosaurs. This earlier rise of mammals could have drastically altered evolutionary outcomes and the subsequent history of life on Earth.

5

A Different Earth

If the Great Dying had never occurred, the Earth today would look significantly different. The absence of this mass extinction event would have allowed for the persistence of a highly diverse and stable ecosystem, with a different distribution of species and ecological relationships. The rise of dinosaurs and mammals could have happened at different times and in different ways, leading to a profoundly altered evolutionary trajectory for these groups. Ultimately, the course of Earth's history without the Great Dying would have resulted in a truly unique and unpredictable present.
